Please get me a map of the order of battle of the Cuban air force and another one with the order of battle of the Cuban navy on it. I'd like to know what air fields and what ports they locate their ships and aircraft on. Either on the charts or separately, I'd like to know what the order of battle is.

Documentary Probes CIA

What ought to be a prominent issue in this political year—the role of the CIA in U.S. foreign policy—is brought clearly into focus by a CBS News documentary airing at 10 tonight on Channels 2 and 8.

The topic is important because the CIA's mission is changing. After several years of relative quiet brought about by a congressional investigation that revealed morally questionable activities over more than two decades, the intelligence agency has found many new supporters this year who, in the wake of the crises in Iran and Afghanistan, contend the CIA ought to be unleashed.

But to whom should the CIA be responsible for its activities? And to what extent should the CIA, or any other U.S. intelligence unit, be involved in covert operations? These are the questions being debated at the White House and in Congress, and in "The Return of the CIA." CBS News lays out the various arguments.

Correspondent Ed Bradley and producer-writer Judy Crichton are tough-minded in their presentation, utilizing on-camera interviews with several former CIA officials to help lay out the evidence of what some of the agency's covert operations led to in the past—assassination plots, government coups, political insurrections.

They end their report optimistically, however finding hope for more responsible U.S. intelligence activity in a pending congressional bill requiring that Congress be brought in on any major spying and covert operations overseas and domestically.
